Abstract

The paper deals with issues of adaptation to climate change, focusing on relations between nature and society at the core of urban life, and questioning current approaches to sustainable planning. The author engages a critical discussion with two different theses on climate change, Parenti's and Acot's, both dealing, from very different perspectives, with causes and outcomes of such massive transformations on societal processes and natural resources. The claim for a human liberation ecology supports the author's thesis of a stronger, ethical and political approach to urban issues related to climate change.
